Report of the attack by residents

Newsreport

"A resident reached by telephone said the militants had returned early Saturday, shouting through loudspeakers that all Shiites must leave or the hostages would be killed. Later, the resident said, the town appeared calm and there was no sign of insurgents. Other residents said no hostages had been taken. The conflicting accounts could not be reconciled" (Associated Press Worldstream)

"El Panadero", also known as "the baker", is the inmate that the victim was trying to interview. He was also a member of the right-wing paramilitary group that was threatening her and other journalists. She had agreed to meet with him because she planned to dissuade him from harming her or others.

"In the eastern region where the massacres occurred, Tamils make up a third of the

Motive behind the attack

Zuwar al-Imam Rida claimed responsibility for the attack and stated that they would release the Turkish pilots once Syrian rebels released nine Lebanese pilgrims that had been abducted in May 2012.

Zulfiqar Ali's note suggested that he was religiously motivated to kill the policemen because they were guarding the American Consulate in Karachi.

Zied Gharbi, a Muslim extremist, claimed responsibility for the attack and accused the police of being "tvtrants."
